Morality is everywhere. No other word has so much to do with the way we live and act. It represents a pattern of living, setting standards or drawing a line in the sand for which we will not cross. Morality is wherever the human animal dwells, be it in schools, offices, or other institutions. It is a subject everyone assumes to know, but can never seem to agree collectively what is right and wrong. People falsely assume others are teaching uniform morality to their subordinates or children. Consequently, we now live in a world where morality is practiced in a inconsistent manner, thereby fueling the fires of political debate, upsetting office decorum, and creating behavior problems with our youth.

This presentation is intended to explain the properties of morality, how it applies in our world, and how we can better teach it. Laced throughout are exercises to promote discussion to fine tune our perspective on morality and how to apply it. Please note, this presentation is not about religion. It will make reference to organized religion as an institution, but it does not advocate or condemn any religious denomination.
